

I'm just happy to have won."

"Everyone who qualifies for Worlds is looking for gold, but I hope to be able to keep my placement and defend my title while skating the best I can," Mulkey said. "When I got there last year I was a little overwhelmed with all the people there, but the adrenaline was flowing and I used that adrenaline skate the best I could. I work really hard twice a day for two each session and work constantly on my routines and jumps and obviously it paid off at nationals."

Mulkey, a relative newcomer to the national scene, and Anderson, a master of the men's singles division, are but two of hundreds of success stories at the national championships. Medalist or not, everyone who qualified for nationals should hold themselves in the highest esteem. They are the athletes who make dreams come true.

Heather Mulkey of San Antonio, Texas, won gold at this year's national championships and in so doing, qualified for her second consecutive trip to World competition. Mulkey was the bronze medalist in women's singles at last year's World championships in Colombia. Photo by Bill Wolf

Keeping a low profile. Bernadette Stringer, Philadelphia, Pa., dips and spins low enough to avoid the outstretched leg and skate of her pairs partner, Jason Cohen of Somerset, N.J. The couple received the silver medal in World Class pairs. Photo by Bill Wolf
